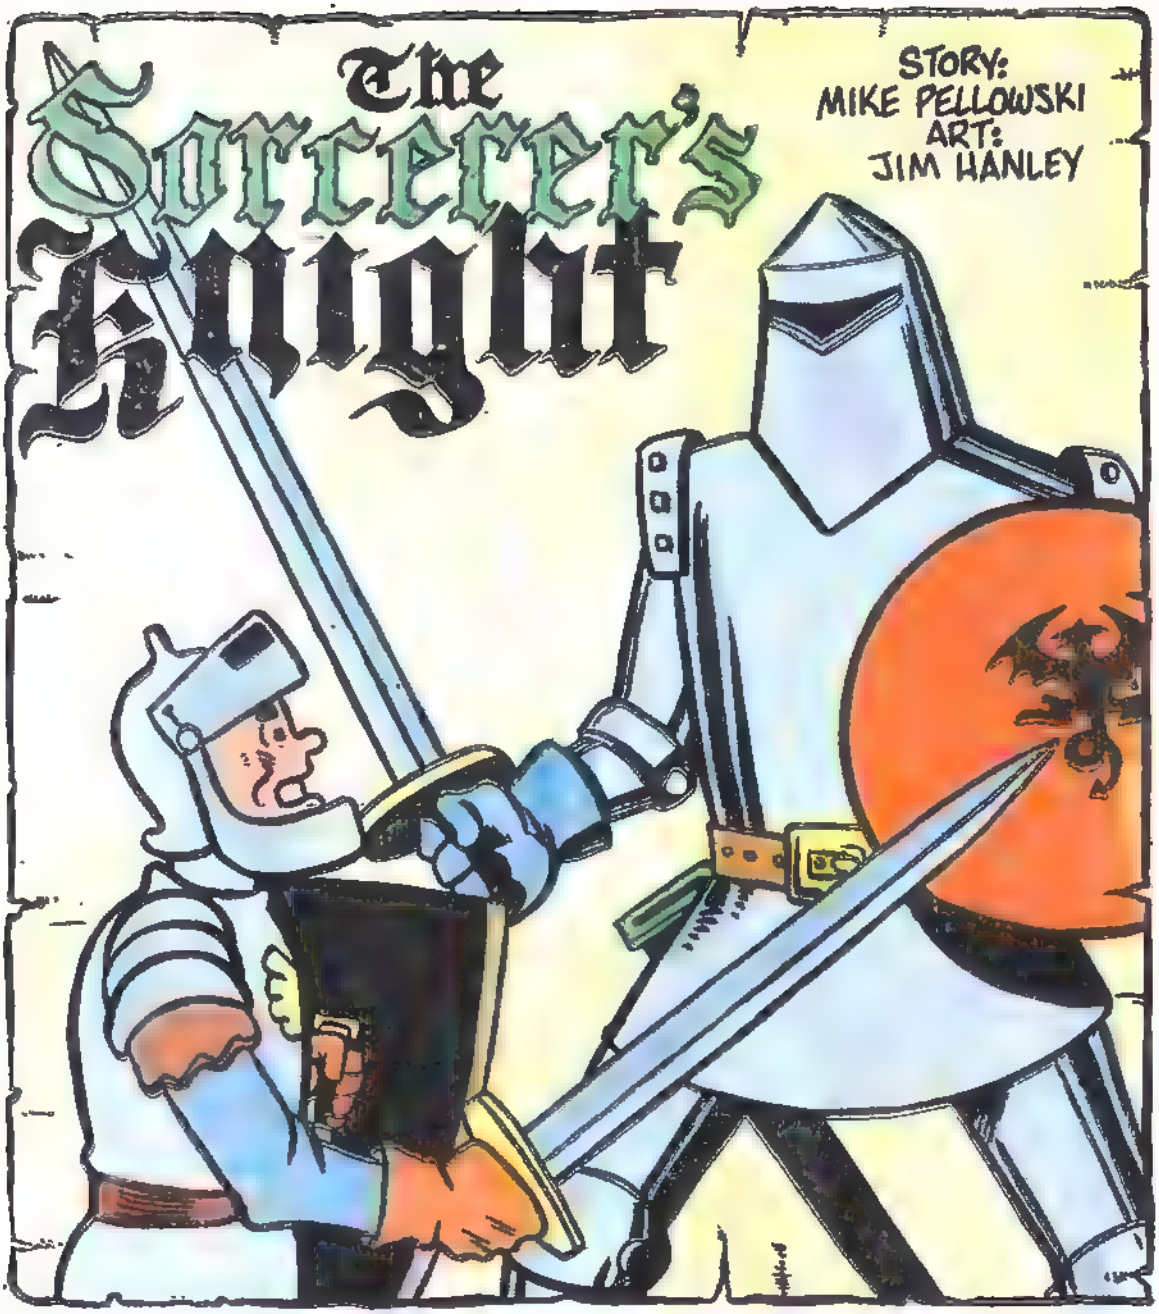
The Sorcerer's Knight

STORY: MIKE PELLOWSKI
ART: JIM HANLEY



Squire Bragget dashed into the quarters of his master, Sir Georgie, the famous dragon slayer of the Round Table. Squire Bragget rushed over to the huge, canopy bed where Georgie was sleeping.

"Wake up, Sir Georgie! Wake up and get dressed quickly! The King wants to see you right away," said Bragget as he pulled back the blankets covering the boy knight and shook the lad violently.

Squire Bragget had once been Sir Bragget of the Round Table. Unfortunately, Sir Bragget was a knight who would rather switch than fight. He could tell thrilling, amusing stories at the Round Table, but in reality, he couldn't fight well enough to save his own life.

Georgie had been his squire until Sir Bragget was ordered by the King to slay a fire-breathing dragon. Georgie had accomplished the deed when Sir Bragget faltered. Georgie was knighted by King Arthur for the heroic feat, and he earned the title of "Dragon Slayer". Sir Bragget was demoted to the rank of squire.

"The king sent an urgent message that he needs you in the throne room immediately," repeated Bragget.

"Then let us make haste to answer Arthur's summons," replied Sir Georgie.

Squire Bragget helped Georgie get dressed. The Dragon Slayer wrapped his sword belt around his waist and locked the buckle. "Let us be off," instructed Georgie as he slid his heavy, steel sword into its scabbard. Georgie and Bragget ran out of the bedroom and down the hall into the King's throne room.

When Georgie and Bragget entered the King's chambers, they were amazed to find two strangers in the room with Arthur. One man was an ugly, toothless, old man. He had long, white hair, a beard and a mustache. He was wearing a black robe with mystical symbols painted on it. He looked like an evil magician. The other man was at least seven feet tall and dressed in a suit of shiny armour. A huge, broadsword dangled at his waist. His helmet was on, and his visor was lowered. His face wasn't visible. He had a black dragon painted on his circular shield. The gigantic, mysterious knight stood there silently and motionless as if he were glued to the castle floor.

"You sent for me, Sire?" said Georgie as he eyed the strangers.

"This man is a sorcerer who lives in the mountains," explained the King as he pointed at the old fellow. "The knight beside him is his champion. He has come here to challenge the knights of the Round Table to a contest of mortal combat. The rules of chivalry state that a challenge such as this cannot go unanswered."

"What is the prize the sorcerer demands if this champion defeats us?" replied Georgie.

"The sorcerer wants my crown. It is his right to make such a demand if his knight can defeat my own. Will you be the first to fight him, Dragon Slayer?" asked the King.

"It will be an honor. Before the sun is high, I will have won the battle and protected your crown," promised Georgie.

One hour later, Squire Bragger handed Sir Georgie his sword as the Dragon Slayer dressed to do battle. "Be careful of the sorcerer's knight. He doesn't move or talk like a normal man. Beware of the sorcerer's magic," warned Bragget as Sir Georgie walked out into the courtyard to meet his adversary.

Trumpets sounded. Arthur, the Sorcerer and Bragget watched the battle begin. The sorcerer's champion had great strength, but he moved slowly and mechanically. Georgie used his speed and agility to dodge the swipes of the giant's sword. Georgie knew that if the mysterious giant hit him one time, the battle would be over.

Georgie carefully evaded the blows of the huge, sharp sword as it sliced through the air above his head. The Dragon Slayer waited for the right moment and then he lashed out with his own weapon. Georgie's sword sliced through the metal neck of his foe. The challenger's helmet fell onto the ground. Everyone was shocked and amazed to see that the suit of armour was empty. No man was inside it. The armour was magic and moving by itself.

Georgie quickly darted in and sliced off the sword arm of his foe. The empty armour fell onto the ground. Soon, there was only a pile of junk remaining where the mysterious knight had once stood. The battle was over and Georgie had won. He had thwarted the evil magician's attempt to win Arthur's crown.

The King and Bragget congratulated Georgie. The Sorcerer began to slink away. "Wait," called Bragget to the magician. "Clean up your trash before you leave," he mocked as he pointed at the pile of armour. Everyone except the magician laughed.
